Description: The last three decades have witnessed the strengthening and mainstreaming of Extreme Right Parties (ERPs) in most Western European party systems. While the electoral fortunes of parties within this family vary greatly, many have managed to establish themselves as relevant actors in government coalitions in countries such as Austria, the Netherlands or Switzerland. These developments have led to heated debates both among mainstream politicians as well as political scientists. This course aims at discussing these developments comparatively. In the first part of the seminar students will be introduced to the ideology of Extreme Right Parties, relating it to established concepts of comparative politics such as party families, cleavages and party competition. Secondly, we will look at what explains the vote for ERPs and how this relates to changes in the economic and political contexts across Western European political systems. Thirdly, we will analyze the impact of ERPs on cultural as well as economic and social policies. Finally, we will look at specific country cases in order to determine what similarities and differences exist between ERPs in Europe.

Prerequisites

The focus of the seminar literature will be on empirical studies which mainly follow a quantitative research design. Therefore, a general understanding of this kind of methodology is highly recommended. Since nearly all reading assignments are in English, this will be the general classroom language as well. Participants therefore must know enough English to be able to participate actively. Perfection is not required – you just need to understand and make yourself understood.

Registration

Students have to register via KLIPS.

Reading assignments

At the beginning of October the required texts for the sessions of the seminar can be accessed via ILIAS. If you register via KLIPS you will automatically have access to the ILIAS files.

Working requirements and assessment method

All participants are expected to:

- complete assigned obligatory readings according to schedule
- actively contribute to class discussions
- give a 20 minutes group-presentation, focusing on ERPs in one country (final part of the seminar)

Submission of the research paper

The research paper have to be handed in an electronic version via email to spies@wiso.uni-koeln.de. The paper version should be handed in personally at the secretary of the Cologne Center for Comparative Politics (IBW Gebäude, Herbert-Lewin-Str. 2, 1st floor, Room 1.09).

Deadline for both is 20th March 2017.

The paper version must contain the following signed statement:
